in the Sierra de San Francisco. This is the only Baja Great Mural 📜 site that can be reached easily by car. I have visited dozens of these rock shelters with their huge painted figures, but it took three mule trips and camping out for more than a week in rough country on each expedition to get to them. The paintings are not visible in this picture, but the shelter is uphill in the background, and visitors are permitted to ascend and view the paintings.

"In March, I bused down to Baja California Sur with a group looking for close encounters with whales in Ojo de Liebre (Scammon's Lagoon) and San Ignacio Lagoon. In March, most of the adult males have left to return to Alaska, and mothers and calves remain but are getting ready to go. The whales seek out people. We had nothing for them but our enthusiasm. We were in small, open boats, expertly operated by the local whale-watching operators, and the whales got right next us and permitted us to touch them. The interaction between the whales and people was prolonged. They stuck around and followed the boat. We seemed to be a source of interest and entertainment, and of course, we were astonished by the close contact. The only thing 'astronomical' about whales is the constellation Cetus the Whale, which was formerly known as Cetus the Sea Monster.

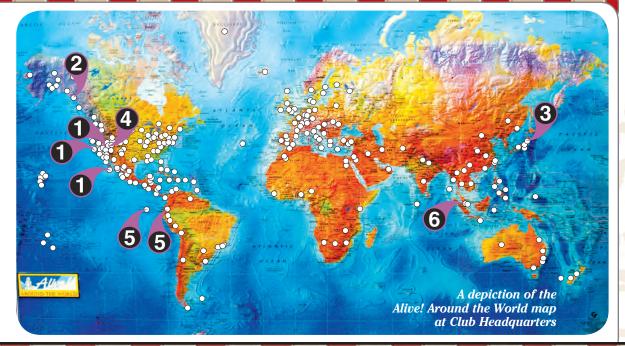

"In April, I returned to the Naval Air Weapons Station, China Lake, near Ridgecrest, Calif., for another look at the prehistoric rock art in the Coso Range, in this case, in Little Petroglyph Canyon, which I'd visited twice before. The human-like figures with decorated bodies, elaborate headdresses, and atlatls are signature images of this style. The exact age of these petroglyphs is unknown. Some are probably 1,500 years old, and some may be as old as 300 years. They were carved by hunter-gatherer Paleoindians in this region and include many images of bighorn sheep. Some 'astronomical' imagery shows up — 'stars,' 'sun disks,' and 'crescent moons,' but most of the rock art has no obvious celestial connotation. I've been permitted over the years to look at petroglyphs in many canyons that are not ormally accessible, but public tours of Little Petroglyph Canyon, which I ve examined twice before, are regularly available through the Maturango Museum in Ridgecrest."

"We had the oppor-tunity to visit the Galapagos in May. Here's a photo of us at the Baltra airport. It was an amazing trip, one of which we will forever remember."

"On our last leg of the South America trip in May, we had fun visiting the Museo de Sitio Intinan on the equatorial marker, a short ride outside of Quito, Ecuador. We had fun at the middle of the world!"

Here's John Radovcich, Harbor, 13 years of City service, in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia. "Being from the Harbor Dept., I always take the Joannie Mukai issue of Alive! with me."

"Here I am at the Batu Caves Temple. Behind me is the magnificent Statue of Lord Murugan, the second tallest of a Hindu deity in the world, standing at 140 feet. To the left of the statue are the stairs leading up to the entrance of the incredible and expansive bat cave chambers.

"50 miles north of Kuala Lumpur is Selangor. This town is known for its evening firefly show along the Selangor River. But during the day, you can go up the hill to feed the hundreds and hundreds of silver leaf monkeys.'
